AN OPTICAL ILLUSION.

As sweet as love first spoken, And fair as the lily's pore. She stands in the window looking out When the day is at its close She's half concealed in the curtain, And I, in the twilight hape. Am watching the sun's last splendor dis And tink her cheek with its rays. Her eyes, like a limpid current, Reflect while past me steal the calm of a heart inured to pain, Or the peace of a promised weal.

I fancy her lips like rose leaves,
Fresh curled at the wake of day,
When the dew comes out from the sweet lawn grass To honey them with its spray. Her throat's adorned by a necklace, She must be dressed for the ball, And, too, her coffure is powder'd white, And o'er her shoulder's a shawl.

That circle which bands the skies-And stilly drop the curtains of night Till my vision numbs my eyes.

But still she does not see me-Intent on my ev'ning star.

Like a Venus there in the new moon's light,
She beams so near and yet so far.

When, lo, the room is lighted, And the candelabra's gleam Reveals a "statue" of Venus there—

JACQUITA.

Midway between Europe and Africa, its shores washed by the blue waters of the Mediterranean, lies the little island of Minorca. Out of the beaten line of travel, overlooked by energetic tourists, it holds its only direct communication with civilization through tramp steamers and an occasional yacht.

Minorca has well nigh forgotten the outside world, and with true southern indolence dreams over its own petty in-terests unless wakened to sudden but evanescent activity by some event out of the common.

The largest city-Port Mahon-clambers up and down the cliffs of its lovely harbor in an aimless way, and on first approaching two things strike you, the dazzling whiteness against the intense blue of sea and sky and the monotony of the flat roofed, chimneyless houses.

The cobble paved streets are marvelously clean, and the people, in their quaint, gay costumes, stand out with picturesque effect against the stuccood walls which line the way.

On a cliff overhanging the harbor and the city is a plaza called the Alameda where a few ilex trees afford a grateful shade. On one of the low stone benches many a pleasant hour may be dreamed away, watching the shadows chase each other over the swelling hills and meadows beyond. Now and again the soft wind wafts perfume from the almond blossoms which lie like flakes of snow on the bare fields stretching away to the

One evening not long ago a young girl was scated on the low wall watching the sun sinking in the cloudless sky. The usual three cornered man-tilla draped her graceful head, and her long, slender fingers toyed with the ends hanging over her shoulders. She represented one of the better class, with the intense southern beauty of the peas-ant idealized. Her black hair waved off a low forehead, guiltless of the pointed "friz" which disfigured the face of those who ape the Parisian fashion. Her brows were heavy, and her dark eyes, riveted on the harbor below, seemed to reflect the sunset light. She was watching a large yacht which, with all sails set, was gliding slowly,

The rattling of the anchor chains roused her and broke the long silence which she had so persistently maintained with her companion, a young man of Spanish type. A mixture of northern blood lightened his olive complexion and refined his sensuous southern features. His waist was circled by a red sash, and his workworn hands twisted a bright colored turban, fashioned from a large handkerchief.

His passionate gaze contrasted strangely with the girl's indifference. "La Bella Jacquita" she was called, and well did she deserve her name! What was he that he should win her, after all?

Jacquita looked up and smiled. As when the sun, breaking through the clouds, bathes the fields in warmth and light, so did that smile transfigure the girl's fair face.

The distant church clock struck 6. Rising, she drew the folds of her mantilla cleser, and lifting her eyes to his said softly, "A Riverdel, Felipe!"

His gaze met hers-pride, anger, passion in his eyes. Mastering his excite-ment, he spoke: "Jacquita, be careful! I am not like those silly lads who come and go at a girl's nod. Today I offer you my life, my heart! A man's dearest hopes and desires have I laid bare. How have you answered?"

He waited. Jacquita pushed the gravel petulantly with her foot, watching the pebbles fly, with a half mocking smile on her lips. Again he spoke:

"I know-you are 'La Bella' of Mahon, but I, too, have pride! Keep your scores of admirers, but know that from today there is one less-one man more is nothing in the tale of your conquests. You are 'La Bella,' and the man who makes you love him must needs be more than human-stronger than Felipe. Never again will I be ridiculed, mocked, as I have been today!"

Jacquita trembled slightly, but still smiled. She waited. Then, looking up, she said, "Felipe, I am sorry"- but Felipe had gone.

That night Jacquita wept with fear, excitement and the triumph of having brought Felipe so low as to beg her as he had done that evening. "He will return," thought she. "They always do."

Next day the party from the yacht made the tour of the town. A little boy of about 6 years of age was the life and a sailor suit, his golden curls waving under his white cap, he formed a strong contrast to the dark skinned children who stared as he passed them by. A see if thou wilt yet say 'Addio,' mia pretty blond girl followed with an eld- Jacquita!"—Raymond Hunt in Roerly gentleman, and as she went along | manca Jacquita, seeing her exquisite fairness, thought, "The angels must look like speech of gentle reproof which Jacquita nad prepared was not delivered. She began to wonder whether she had beter accept him. The fun would then be over, but—supposing the other thing! Life would be as nothing with Felipe left out!

Evening came and found Jacquita and her mother seated at their door conversing with the neighbors, leaning out of window or strolling past. The "sum-mer-winter," as they call our "Indian summer," lingered late that year.

A group gathered, among them Francesca, the rival beauty. She was larger in every way than Jacquita. To many the was more attractive, being less chary of her brilliant smiles and jests. "Hast heard the news?" she was say-

"As the 'Inglesi' were walking back to the yacht this afternoon down on the quay the little boy, catchsight of a large dog ahead, ran after him along the edge of the water. Suddenly, 'Ah, Santissima Maria!' he cried out-and then the water closed over him! Felipe was there and jumped in after him. There was no danger," she added, glancing maliciously at Jacquita's pale face, "and in a moment more he was being embraced by the pretty young lady. But Felipe! Milard overwhelmed him with thanks, offered him money, which the fool re-fused, and finally asked if he knew the sea and would care to come with him as a sailor. For a moment Felipe hesi-tated, but"—and here the bright look on Jacquita's face faded—"he finally said, 'Yes, Milord,' and so he goes tomorrow! Ah, but he is a brave lad, that Felipe, and a lucky one! Some of us will care, but to those who have no hearts"-and here she glanced coldly at the girl sitting silent beside her-"to those it will make no difference."

Just then Felipe himself sauntered up. There was a difference between th nonchalent young sailor, bearing his honors so lightly, and the passionate lover of the night before. "Good luck, Felipe!" some one called, and Francesca, again the spokeswoman, cried, "Your fame has flown before you, and your good fortune makes us envious."

Felipe turned to Jacquita. She was talking animatedly to a young fellow beside her—seemingly oblivious of all else. Felipo's face darkened. Then, laughing, he turned, saying: "Come, friends, let us have a merry time on this our last night together. Come, drink my health and prosperity with me!" "Si! Si!" they answered.

Jacquita alone declined. She was "too tired," she said haughtily. Franoesca, shrugging her shoulders, murmured: "One of her ugly moods! Santissima—what a temper!' Jacquita listened to the retreating footsteps, and her downcast eyes filled with tears, why, she would not own to herself. A quick step sounded, a voice said, "Jacquita!" Something — false pride perhaps or fear lest Felipe should see her weeping—held down her eyes, but she smiled.

"Thou didst not say 'Addio,' or even lucky wish, Jacquita!" Silence, then a smothered oath broke from his lips, and ere she could frame the words of farewell still lingering on her tongue she heard him striding down the street. As he turned the corner, snatches of a waltz-one of Francesca's favorites—came floating back to her. Early the next morning, while the Alameda yo* lay wrapped in sleep, a girl leaned over the sea wall, gazing with burning eyes at the beautiful boat below. The bustle of departure reached her straining ears, and she saw a rowboat speed out to the ship. A cheer rose from those on shore as with a final pull the anchor was hauled aboard. The broad sails filled slowly, and she slipped away as silently as she came—away into the purple mists of the morning, away, and bearing with her a whole life's grief and disappointment. "'La Bella Jacquita' is going daft. cries Francesca as every night the girl walks to the Alameda, watching for a boat that never comes. One evening she sat gazing at a tramp steamer just anchored. She recalled that other night, and the boat now so far of about 6 years of age was the life and center of interest of the group. Clad in of Mahon!" The setting sun covered her with its golden light. Her dark eyes grew larger with unshed tears. Then a voice said softly, "I have come back to
